Second most expensive camera ever sold:

Leica O-Series No. 112 from 1923 Auctioned for 7.2 Million Euros

Wetzlar 27th of June 2025. Leica celebrates the 100-year anniversary of the iconic Leica I with numerous high-profile events around the globe. Held on 27 June as part of the Leica Century Event in Wetzlar, Leitz Photographica Auction 46 received particular attention, not least due to the O-Series No. 112, a rare camera of considerable historical significance and monetary value, manufactured in 1923. It is one of the few surviving prototypes of the Leica I and was auctioned for 7.2 million euros including premium¹.

Never before has photography developed as rapidly as in the past 100 years, both in terms of its technical innovations and its cultural significance. The Leica I, the world's first serially produced 35mm camera, which was presented to the public in 1925, marked the beginning of this immensely prolific period. Before production commenced in 1925, Leica Camera AG (in its previous iteration Ernst Leitz Werke) had built a few prototypes – the so-called O-Series with the serial numbers 101-125.

The existence of almost a dozen of these Leica O-Series cameras is still known today. As milestones in the history of photography and trailblazers of photojournalism, they are now coveted collector's items. This also includes the Leica O-Series No. 112, auctioned on June 27 at Leica World in Wetzlar.

Historically significant and expensive

"It is a truly special occasion for our auction house, to offer a O-Series in the midst of the 100th anniversary of the Leica I. Even more so, since this particular O-Series was received by Oskar Barnack² after production", says Alexander Sedlak, Managing Director of Leitz Photographica Auction. According to him, the impact of the O-Series on modern photography cannot be emphasised enough. "These prototypes were used to develop the trailblazing Leica I, which took photojournalism into new spheres and transformed photography from an extravagant hobby into an ubiquitous phenomenon."

Estimated at 1.5 to 2 million euros, the Leica O-Series No. 112 ultimately achieved a price of 7.2 million euros including premium at the 46th Leitz Photographica Auction. 'A sum that is definitely appropriate for this extraordinary piece of history,' says Alexander Sedlak. This makes the No. 112 the second most expensive camera ever sold. The world record is 14.4 million euros including premium, which was
